THE JONGE'S DAUGHTEM.

[CONCLUDED.]

War was declared—that was manifest.—
The young man was John Bromley, grandson, of the father of Mrs. Cameren, cousin of Kate, and the first of that family who had ever been seen in the house of the Camerons. He now interposed, with some confasion indeed, but politely:
"Accident makes necessary, Mr. Cameron, what I had intended to defer until a more suncious time, when our present was a work requiring no small mental determination. But he did it ealmly, repeating what he had said before, and saying in aubstance that though no evidence of bad character, it was entitled to its weight in connection with the other evidence in the case.

Day broke on the city, and light stole into the court-room—gray, and feeble, and cold at the first, fushing up at length into the court-room—gray, and feeble, and the full glory of the surprise. Men were now astonished to observe what a change the night had made in Judge Cameron's countenance. He was baggard, worn, and thin. He looked twenty, years older than on the previous day. The prisoner remained lavisible.

At seven o'clock the jury entered. Man he were chosened unmoved. Her counsel and wisdow and saw him diamount from his carriage. Turning back suddenly, wire at than the judge. And he told him all the circumstances and his plan. Stevens lustened, and his yeas opened wider and wider, nutil when he assned Emily Carlton, his eyes abut with a snap so quick they could almost have been heard. Stevens now seemed to enter the fully into his plans, and they arranged the minuties without difficulty.

The next week was fixed for the accomplishment.

On the appointed morning Stevens was to present himself at the school as a messenger from the city with intelligence of the severe illness of Mrs. Carlton, and a request for the timmediate attendance of the daughter. He was to convey her by carriage to the river, where they would to in them the same evening at a place to be appointed by Stevens.
