POETRY.

Antiquity the Socks.

By the roadside, softly seated, With spectacles resting on his nose,

The old man sat in quietude, His hands upon his knees,

Who would have thought that he, In that old age, should be so wise,

Who would have thought that he, In that old age, should be so wise,

Who would have thought that he, In that old age, should be so wise,

Who would have thought that he, In that old age, should be so wise,

Who would have thought that he, In that old age, should be so wise,

Who would have thought that he, In that old age, should be so wise,

Who would have thought that he, In that old age, should be so wise,
